Taiji, Mindfulness and Psychotherapy

By Dr. Doug Rabb

On March 3rd and 4th Master Peng You and I participated in the Sixth Annual Building Bridges Mental Health and Addictions Conference at the Valhalla Inn here in Thunder Bay. We had our Peng You Taiji Quan Association display table in a prominent place throughout the conference to help explain the health benefits of Taiji (much thanks to Brian Nieminen for help with set up). During the conference we signed up a number of people for Peng's June workshop on Taiji Qigong Six Forms for Health. Peng was invited to do Taiji with all 250 plus conference participants at the plenary sessions on both Thursday and Friday. As one of the speakers was late for a concurrent session I attended, I was able to take the participants through some of Taiji Qigong Six Forms for Health to fill in time as we waited for the scheduled session to begin. I was pleased to meet, as fellow participants, some of my former students from Lakehead University who are now counselors and social workers in the city and the region.

During the workshops, I learned that "mindfulness" is now being used as a technique in psychological counseling, often combined with cognitive therapy. As a Taiji instructor I found this most interesting, as mindfulness is based on ancient Eastern meditative and breathing techniques. One of the major proponents of mindfulness in psychotherapy is Dr. Jon Kabat-Zinn of the University of Massachusetts Medical School. In his paper "Mindfulness-Based Interventions in Context: Past, Present, and Future," he suggests "an operational working definition of mindfulness is: the awareness that emerges through paying attention on purpose, in the present moment, and non-judgmentally to the unfolding of experience moment by moment. Historically, mindfulness has been called ‘the heart’ of Buddhist meditation” (Clinical Psychology: Science and Practice Vol. 10, No. 2, 2003). In many psychological clinical studies employing mindfulness, hatha yoga breathing and postures are employed. (Journal of Clinical Psychology in Medical Settings, Vol. 11, No. 4, 2004).

I think that taiji practice could be used most effectively as an adjunct or alternative to hatha yoga in a clinical setting. After all, taijiquan also concentrates on both breathing and moving mindfully. I will illustrate with the move, step up, deflect downward, parry and punch. Actually, I will just concentrate on parry and punch, as that is complicated enough when describing moving with mind intent. The taiji punch, like all taiji moves, is delivered using the waist, not just the arm and fist. Think of your torso as a spool of thread and your arm as the thread unrolling from the spool. The spool must turn to allow the thread to be drawn from it. So you must turn your waist as your arm goes out to deliver the punch. If you are punching with your right fist, your waist turns to the left as your right arm goes out. To begin the parry and punch stand with your heels together, toes facing the front corners of the room you are in. Your feet with their heels together form a kind of “V” shape. Shift weight to your right leg and step out, toward your imaginary opponent at the front of the room, with your left foot, placing it down gently heel first without shifting any weight from your right (now your back) leg, which should be slightly bent, supporting your entire body. At the same time swing your left arm out parallel with your left leg as a kind of parry or block. In a martial arts situation it is there to deal with whatever your opponent is about to do, whether punching or blocking. As your left leg and your left arm go out your waist must turn to the right (remember the spool of thread). Your waist should now be facing in the same direction as your right foot. You are now ready to throw a taiji punch. Form a fist with your right hand, palm up beside your right hip. By straightening your right leg shift your weight slowly forward so that 70% of your weight ends up on your left leg. Bend your left leg at the knee to receive the weight, but do not let your knee go beyond your toes as you shift your weight forward. At the same time turn your waist to face in the direction your left foot is facing and, remembering the spool of thread, deliver the punch by driving your right fist forward in a corkscrew motion so your fist turns a quarter turn from palm up to thumb side up. Your thumb is not on top of your fist. It is nestled safely outside in the crease between your first and second fingers. In the traditional taiji form your left hand comes to rest, fingers up, against the middle your right forearm. Follow the taiji principle “When one part of the body moves the whole body moves. When one part of the body stops the whole body stops.” Your fist should land on your imaginary opponent at the same time as you complete the 70% weight shift and the turning of the waist. They should all reach completion simultaneously. Not only must you keep all this in mind when throwing a simple taiji punch, but you must also concentrate on your breathing. Inhale as you step out and parry. You should expand your lower abdomen as you inhale to ensure as deep a breath as possible. As you punch exhale and just as you complete the punch pull your abdomen in, lifting the abdominal floor ensuring a complete exhale to strengthen the punch.

This kind of moving with mindfulness is done throughout the taiji form. I have used the parry and punch move, as an example to draw attention to the fact that taiji is one of the martial arts. Most of the participants I met at the Building Bridges Conference are addiction counselors. They are a tough lot, as are their clients. Not many of them would be willing to adopt yoga postures or to meditate. This is unfortunate because the literature on mindfulness meditation suggests that it is very effective in dealing with substance abuse. If we can use a martial art like taiji instead of yoga perhaps more of these addiction counselors will consider mindfulness training.

What is needed are well-trained counselors with clinical experience to learn some basic taiji principles and introduce moving with mindfulness meditation in their clinical practice (preferably with a control group so we can assess the results). As we noted above, a number of counselors signed up at the Building Bridges Conference for Master Peng’s Instructors’ Workshop on Taiji Qigong Six Forms for Health, which is to be held in June. Perhaps this is the start we need to conduct further research in this area.

TAIJI QIGONG: SIX FORMS FOR HEALTH WORKSHOP with Instructor Certification Option.

No previous knowledge of Taiji (Tai Chi) is required. This workshop is especially designed for health care professionals, though all students of taiji are welcome.

Instructed by Master Peng You, the only Taiji Instructor in North America qualified by the creators of Taiji Qigong Six Forms for Health, Grandmaster Zeng Nailiang retired head coach of the Chinese National Wushu team and his wife Taiji Master Wei Xianglian, to offer certification courses in this form of complementary health.

The six forms of Taiji Qigong for Health combine the flowing coordinated movements of Taijiquan with the meditative concentration on Qi and deep breathing of Qigong. The form can be learned in a relatively short time. Though easy to learn the Six Forms offers the benefits of increased strength, better balance and coordination and greater confidence in one's physical and mental abilities. Once mastered it can become the bridge to other forms in Taiji Quan and Qigong.

Location: International Taiji Academy, 270 Windsor St (Boys and Girls Club, Junot entrance)

Time and Date: 9:30 am - 4:30 pm, Saturday June 18 & Sunday June 19, 2011

Fees: Early Bird Special (register before May 18, 2011) $175.00.

Fee After May 18: $200.00

Fee for Optional Instructor Certification: An additional one-time payment of $25.00 will be charged for the Instructors' Examination. To receive certification you must demonstrate knowledge of the basic principles of Taiji (which will be covered in the workshop) and also the ability to teach each of the six moves of Taiji Qigong for Health. There is no charge for additional testing if required.
